

Taking away the 'default right' of a consumer to copy content switches the default priority away from the consumer, who may have legitimate uses, assumes guilt of any and all possible scenarios and is therefore a gross error in judgement. Copyright was introduced as an alternative to the 'default right' inherent to all citizens to freely share information. Passing such restriction against consumers takes away their rights by giving them away freely to amoral corporations who care only about profit and nothing else. These corporations absolutely must NEVER attain the 'default right' to control information. History has shown us that corporations will never act in the best interest of the consumer unless federally mandated. I plead that you, as a federal decision making body, rule against the profit-driven interests of corporations and for the rights of citizens.

Thank you for your time.
